THE END

THE HUTIER TACTICS

By the end of 1917, Germany had given up hopes of winning the war through unrestricted submarine warfare. But there still was time for the Germans to strike a decisive blow in the west before the full strength of American arms could be brought to bear. Many troops were available as a result of the collapse of Russia. And Germany decided to resume the offensive.

Field Marshal Erich von Ludendorff, now virtually in command of the German Army, selected the Somme area for the attack, hoping that a break-through there would drive a wedge between the French and the British. And that a British defeat would cause the French to lose heart and agree to peace.

In addition to surprise, the Germans banked heavily on the effectiveness of new tactics they had developed to penetrate strongly entrenched positions. The Hutier tactics, named after the German general who had developed and first applied them in the siege of Riga, had proved highly successful at Caporetto in Italy and also against the British at Cambrai in 1917.

The German tactics called for a short, intensive artillery shelling of previously spotted positions to neutralize them without destroying surprise. This artillery preparation was followed by an immediate infantry assault in which, battle groups armed mostly with machine guns and automatic rifles, advanced closely behind a rolling barrage that moved forward at a predetermined rate varying according to the terrain.

In the first phase of the attack, assault troops infiltrated and isolated known centers of resistance within range of their artillery. The attack then entered a second phase marked by a rapid advance without regard to flank security. Enemy positions that had not been wiped out were bypassed and left for succeeding units to mop up. To enable the infantry to cope with the local resistance that small arms fire could not overcome, light artillery was attached to some units. Accompanying guns fired point-blank at a definite target — such as machine gun nests, tanks and pillboxes. This was a tactical use of horse drawn artillery heretofore considered suicidal in trench warfare. To avoid loss of momentum, assault divisions were pushed to the limit before being relieved.

The new tactics put a premium on courage, physical stamina, initiative and coordination. Only troops intensively trained as battle groups could carry them out successfully. Fortunately for the Allies, the Germans were too short of time and reserves, and too limited in equipment to indoctrinate all their divisions in the new methods.

This forced Ludendorff to select only the best divisions, to withdraw them for the line and to put them through an intensive course of instruction. Live ammunition was used in training to accustom the troops to follow closely behind a rolling barrage. As a result of thorough preparation, confidence and morale rose rapidly throughout the German Army. But more was needed. Ludendorff, recognizing that no offensive could hope to succeed on the Western Front without surprise went into action. He ordered elaborate security measures and even chose his army commanders from those who had previously won laurels in surprise attacks. Among them was Lt. Gen. Oskar von Hutier.

On March 21 the first blow fell with a shattering force on the British. Their lines were pierced and for a time it looked as though the German advance might develop into a pursuit. By March 26, Amiens, a strategically located rail center, was in serious danger. If it fell, continued cooperation between the French and British armies would be difficult if not impossible. In the crisis, Ludendorff hurled 20 fresh divisions into the battle but they were repulsed mainly because they were untrained in the Hutier tactics.

On March 27, a gap was created between the French and the British armies but German troops, now exhausted and out of supplies, were unable to exploit the situation. Allied reserves moved rapidly into the threatened area by rail and succeeded in plugging the gap. By the end of the month the German drive had lost its momentum, bogged down in mud and debris. By April 5, the offensive was definitely over.

Tactically the Germans had won a brilliant victory. Leading units had succeeded in breaking through the Allied positions and had advanced 40 miles in 8 days, taking 70,000 prisoners and 1,100 guns; inflicting about 200,000 casualties. But strategically the offensive had not succeeded. The British Army, although seriously battered, wasn't destroyed. Amiens was not captured. And lateral communications between the Allies were not disrupted. For their gains, the Germans had paid a high price in human life, particularly in the shock divisions whose trained men could least be spared. Equally harmful to German chances of ultimate victory was the unity of Allied command achieved as a result of the crisis on the Somme.

Despite the indecisive battle on the Somme, General Erich Ludendorff clung to his basic plan to destroy the British Army before dealing with the French and the Americans. This time he chose to strike in the Lys area in Flanders, north of the previous point of attack. On April 9, the Germans again applied their new tactics. As before, they succeeded initially in overrunning British positions and inflicting heavy damage.

So desperate was the situation that Haig issued a "backs to the wall" order, urging his troops to fight to the end. He also appealed to Foch for help. The Supreme Commander, convinced that the British could hold and, determined to regain the initiative, refused to commit his reserves to battle. His decision proved sound.

The British held and again the Germans failed to win a decision. Their tactical performance was excellent though not equal to that in the previous offense. The battle also betrayed a weakness in the German Army not heretofore discernible. For the first time, discipline collapsed to a serious degree, as the troops overran British food dumps and took precious time out during a critical phase of the battle to loot. The long blockade was beginning to affect even the iron-disciplined German Army. By April 29, having committed 46 divisions to action, General Ludendorff called off the offensive. For a few weeks, quiet reigned on the West Front punctuated only by local attacks, air battles and a long range artillery bombardment of Paris.

Still hoping to defeat the British and roll them back to the channel ports, Ludendorff planned to renew the battle in Flanders as soon as he had regrouped his forces. To attain surprise, he decided on a diversionary attack on the Chemin des Dames, a dominant and strongly held ridge east of the Aisne River. The position had become a quiet sector to which battle weary Allied divisions were sent to recuperate. So confident was the local commander in the natural strength of his area that he failed to organize a defense in depth, which Pétain had urged upon him and which experience had shown was the best way to counteract the Hutter tactics.

Even so, an attack on such a strong position as Chemin des Dames was exceedingly dangerous. The Germans therefore prepared their attack with even greater secrecy than before. On May 26 the assault began following a short but intensive shelling of Allied lines. The bombardment was the more effective because much of the defending forces had been deployed well forward by the local commander.

By the end of the first day the Germans had reached all their objectives, advancing 13 miles and taking most of the bridges across the Aisne before the French could destroy them. This unexpected success led Ludendorff to change his plans. What he had conceived as a diversionary attack to prevent the French from supporting the British, he now decided to turn into a major offensive. He rushed reserves forward and ordered the advance to continue in the hope that the momentum of the attack would enable the Germans to establish bridgeheads across the Marne for future use should he decide on a drive toward Paris.

By May 29, the Germans reached Chateau Thierry, less than 40 miles from Paris. And the situation looked very dark for the Allies. In the crisis, the French commander appealed to General Pershing for help. He responded with two divisions. The 3rd Division was rushed to the scene by rail and motor, arriving just as the Germans prepared to cross the Marne. In a three day battle every German effort to establish a bridgehead was repulsed. West of Chateau Thierry, the 2nd Division, including a brigade of Marines, was committed to action along the Chateau Thierry-Paris road. There too, the Germans were checked in a series of bitterly fought local actions which ended in an American attack that recaptured Belleau Wood and the villages of Bouresches and Vaux.

The price paid at Belleau Wood was high, but the action changed German opinion on the combat effectiveness of American troops from one of open skepticism to respect. Soon the Americans would take their first offensive and the Germans would launch their last offensive. The end was in sight for German military might.

WE'VE CROSSED THE RHINE--AND THEY NEED A TRANSMITTER, A GENERATOR AND RADIO RECEIVERS OVER THERE! GET THE GEAR AND I'LL LEAD YOU TO THE AREA!

BURLEY AND HIS MEN COLLECTED THE EQUIPMENT IN FIVE MINUTES--MAJOR TAGG LED THEM TO THE RIVER WHERE THE BOAT WAS WAITING.

HOW MANY OF OUR BOYS ARE OVER THERE, SIR?

NOT ENOUGH--THEY TOOK THE REMAGEN BRIDGE--BUT IT'S CLOGGED WITH TRAFFIC! THE NAVY HAD THESE BOATS READY FOR THIS!

COMM TEAM--OVER HERE! WE'VE GOT TO GET THAT RADIO WORKING!

OKAY, CAPTAIN! YOU HEARD HIM, BOYS! GRAB THE STUFF--LET'S GO!

ATTACK

THE CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR

A LOT OF MARINES IN MY OUTPOST RATED THE MEDAL--BUT THEY DID THEIR STUFF UNOBSERVED OR THE COMPANY COMMANDER'S RECOMMENDATION WASN'T WRITTEN STRONGLY ENOUGH OR SOMETHING! THAT'S OKAY WITH US MARINES--THAT KIND OF A MEDAL SHOULDN'T GO TO TOO MANY GUYS ANYHOW. BUT I WAS WITH A GUY, THE NIGHT HE EARNED ONE...AND I FEEL JUST AS GOOD AS IF THEY PINNED IT ON MY CHEST!

BANZAI! BANZAI!

BEAT IT, JACKSON! I CAN'T MOVE WITH THIS LEG! GO ON, GET OUT!

PING!

PING!

4374

LOBO REDMAN AND I GOT OUT THERE AHEAD OF THE PLATOON THAT NIGHT BECAUSE OF A MISTAKE I MADE! I WAS A B.A.R. MAN AND I WAS EAGER TO GET UP MY WEAPON IN A GOOD SPOT! THAT WASN'T EASY...

SIMMER DOWN, JACKSON! THE LOBBY SAID TO SET IT UP HERE! WE CAN'T ALL BE HEROES IN THIS WAR!

C'MON--WE'RE MOVIN' UP!

BUDDA!
BUDDA!

ATTACK

THE LIEUTENANT WAS BUSY ON THE FIELD PHONE--I LOOKED FOR THE SERGEANT--HE WAS ALREADY HIT! CPL. LOBO REDMAN WAS NEAREST!

WAIT A MINUTE, LOBO! WHERE'S A GOOD SPOT FOR MY S.A.R.?

THE LOOPY'LL TELL YUH, JACK! I'VE GOT TROUBLES OF MY OWN--LIKE LOCATIN' THE JAP LIGHT MORTAR PLATOON!

I KNEW WHAT HE MEANT--THE JAPS HAD KNEE-MORTARS--DOZENS OF THEM AND THEY WERE DOING PLENTY OF DAMAGE TO US MARINES!

LOBO REDMAN WAS ALONE--HE NAILED TWO JAP MORTAR UNITS BEFORE I ARRIVED WITH MY S.A.R.! IT WAS A PERFECT SITE FOR MY GUN!

JACKSON, YUH WARHOUND--YUH'LL GET US BOTH KILLED!

YOU CAN'T LIVE FOREVER, BUDDY--NOT IN THE MARINES!

ATTACK

REDMAN USED HIS BARAND
LIKE A MAGIC WAND...
WHEREVER HE POINTED IT A JAP WENT DOWN!

NAILING ONE JAP AFTER ANOTHER...

MY BROWNING AUTOMATIC WAS SINGING A SWEET
SONG TOO...

THERE WERE SEVENTY OF THEM IN THAT POCKET-- BY THE TIME THEY DECIDED ON A BANZAI
CHARGE, FIFTY OF THEM WERE LEFT!

BANZAI! BANZAI!

I'M HIT...
